So, if you shoot in RAW mode, if you shoot something very dynamic, you can continue to make changes and get the best picture possible. The reason I ask is that I have heard that Lightroom can be a slow process. What is your experience? After trying Lightroom 5 for a few months, I have found that I need to adjust to the changes painfully. I have been using Lightroom 4 and Photoshop; however, I like to edit the images in Photoshop, therefore using Lightroom is more comfortable for me. Photoshop CC also adds a variety of new Perspectives, filters, brushes and effects. Adobe extended the raw formatter to mirror the workflows found in competing programs like Lightroom. This makes it possible to export high-quality scans from the program directly to Lightroom. It also brings new communication features to make it easier to create an online collaboration portal for sharing content. This makes it possible to access files from the cloud, and sync up with other accounts. This adds a new feature called "Time Travel," which lets you easily share and view online personas, and provides a completely new interface option. The recently launched Adobe Pilot App for iPad (beta) brings real-time visual feedback to Adobe's all-time-best mobile image editing experience, and the new Adobe Sensei integration makes the app even smarter by learning and adapting to the user's style and preferences as they edit. Getting real-time feedback on the appearance of their edits is also now possible, by adding commentary to brushes and selections, instantly making every brush stroke or selection in Photoshop visible to the user in the app. People love feedback, so "Share for Review", a new feature in Photoshop, enables users to easily collaborate using real-time, text-based reviews with other Photoshop users online or in-app without leaving Photoshop. Share for Review, first introduced in Photoshop CC in August 2016, has now become fully integrated with in-app commenting. Users can continue to work within Photoshop, while their comments are visible in real-time for all teammates to see, and comments can be read, approved or edited by users, leaving the in-app reviewer in complete control over the review.
