The new DNG export format is good. My workflow changed a bit so that I have less need to export and look at the DNG. You can preview it in Photoshop, and you can search in the lens and see it within Photoshop on the Places panel. The only thing I would like is a simple and obvious way to create a "shortcut" to it from the viewer. You can make images look more colorful with the new adjustment tools, such as the Radial filter and the Lens Correction, and you can also make more artistic choices like the Gradient or Filter palette. If you have direct access to the camera's raw file, you could probably get away with needing this new step of the Lightroom workflow. While you can use Basic Adjustments to enhance your images before you import them into Lightroom, you may find that certain aspects of a photo's appearance need to be controlled by Layer Styles, which are a separate part of Lightroom's catalog. Adobe's layer styles tools work as they have in the past—just drag and drop them onto layers, adjust their controls such as opacity and color, drag a new style onto a layer, or save a new style as a custom preset. You can also use Photoshop's Clone Stamp to edit a particular object or feature within an image, and the move, resize, and rotate capabilities are now even faster with the application. You can also optimize layers via a new optimization function, and you can adjust their Opacity and Color channels in the Adjustment Panel. If you have Photoshop CC, the speed of editing may not be your top choice of features. But if you're one of the creative professionals who swear by your quality workflow, the speed of switching between tools (like the new merge and crop tools) and the new Content Aware Fill (aka Clarity in Photoshop) may be your top tool.
